What does and does not constitute cheating

It is cheating to consult with any person (except the proctor) by any means during an exam (e.g., looking at another student’s work), to use any information (e.g., notes, formulas) other than that provided with the exam, or to use any electronic device.

It is forbidden to have a cell phone or any other electronic device visible during an exam. There is no acceptable reason for doing so, including statements like “Just turning my phone off.” To do so is treated as the same as any other cheating offense.

Suspected violations will be handled according to university policy (set forth at http://legal.uncc.edu/policies/up-407).